THE BEVERLY RAID

The period intervening between the capture of the Garrison, which consisted of the 8th Ohio Cavalry and the 84th Ohio Infantry, until our departure on the morning of the twelfth was marked by many experiences of interest. Unusual liberties incident to army life were granted to those who were not guarding prisoners or rendering picket duty. Many of us passed back and forth from the position which had been taken two miles up the valley to the town during the day. The people were courteous and kindly disposed toward us; the writer enjoyed a good dinner in the home of a most agreeable family. The name has faded from my memory, but the kindness received has often been recalled with pleasing recollections. Another incident floats up on memory's sea of which a vivid remembrance still abides. While sitting on my horse in the street near the central part of the town waiting for the return of a comrade a bullet was fired by one of the federal soldiers who had made his escape across the river at the time when the charge was made. The deadly missile, making music familiar only to him who has been on the battlefield, passed near my head and struck the guttering that conveyed the water from the roof to the ground at a point near the second floor, severing it in twain. I was the only horseman for some distance either way, and as the view between me and the river was unobstructed by any object the shot was evidently aimed at me. This was the second such instance which from certain knowledge occurred in my army experience.

In the battle of the morning we stated in the former paper that two Confederates were killed and Col. Cook had lost a limb. There were about six Union soldiers killed and a number wounded. One poor fellow had fled from camp and was struck by the fatal missile just as he reached the turnpike and lay on his back silent in death.

On the morning of the 12th in line of march with guards on each side of the prisoners we slowly moved up that beautiful valley which borders on each side of Tygart river. The night near Beverly had been a test of courage both to the Confederates and prisoners, especially to the latter. Our men had no camp equipment except what we carried on our horses, while the prisoners had run out of their comfortable quarters, some of them barefooted, at least without their shoes, blouses, overcoats, caps, and other articles absolutely necessary in view of the cold weather. A detail was sent back after the camp had been established to gather up clothing and other articles that had been left. But there were many misfits while not enough were to supply the demands of all the men. Owing to frozen feet and other misfortunes some were paroled in the morning as they were not in condition to join in the march. Others were left along the road who probably were fortunate enough to find generous hearted citizens who would care for them until they could return home.

Near the close of the day we halted for the night near Huttons ville which we learned had been burned by Union soldiers in the summer of 1861. Just forty-eight hours before we had halted on the other side of the river near the residence—if my diary is correct—of a Mr. Hutton and had remained there until nine o'clock before moving down the valley also on the opposite side of the river. This allusion is made to refute a statement furnished the writer of the History of the Laurel Brigade by some one with a lively imagination said that the command camped on the night of the tenth on a mountain side in "Devil's Hollow."

This startling feature in the movement did not come under the observation of the writer. We did not lie down for sleep during the entire night, nor did we remove the saddles from our horses unless it was when halting near Mr. Hutton's. About eight o'clock that night, January 12, our men were ordered from our camp in consequence of a rumor of approaching Federal soldiers. After forming in line of battle at several points, on learning that it was a false alarm returned to the camp where the prisoners had been left in care of guards. The weather was very disagreeable and there were numerous streams to be crossed and we were greatly moved by the prisoners wading the river.

Already a warm friendship had been formed between the men who had only a day or two before been in arms against each other. A strong attachment had been formed between a prisoner by the name of Simms and his comrade whose name I have forgotten and myself. I made it a duty, whenever it was possible to, carry them across the creek by taking one over behind me and then returning for the other. On returning to our starting point, when we came to turn our prisoners over to the authorities, each of them persisted in giving me a memento; from one I received a necktie, from the other a pocket comb which I kept for years. We bivouacked for the night near the residence of Wm. Gibson, on Elk river, if I am not mistaken. Camp fires were built around which the prisoners, and a guard was appointed from the 7th regiment for this service, and also for picket duty. A cold wave was sweeping over hill and valley, and the camp fire, with inadequate clothing, was neither sufficient to keep the soldier or prisoner from suffering, while to the pickets and guards the penetrating northwest wind was almost unendurable. While walking my beat and guarding the prisoners, I would find myself, from fatigue and loss of sleep, involuntarily sinking down, when I would awake to the realization of my responsibility. The snow was deep, and drifting along the fences and ravines, but the writer who painted the drifts as being "twenty five feet in the gorges" saw scenes that were not visible to the writer of this communication. Incidental to the route pursued on the 14th we passed two points that had become historic. One was the crossing of Greenbrier bridge and the other was Huntersville through which we passed late in the afternoon and halting for the night a few miles beyond.

Headly, while an extreme partisan and by no means reliable in his accounts of battles during the war of 1861-65, describes two encounters at the bridge. Milroy after a rapid march during the night with five thousand men made an attack on the confederate about day break on October 2, 1861. There were thirteen guns poured shot and shell on the Confederates in their entrenchments who also responded with the cannon at their command. Headly says that Milroy, not wishing to incur the sacrifice of life that an assault would have required, withdrew after the loss of eight men killed and thirty two wounded. The second skirmish occurred at the bridge when Major Webster who had been ordered to Huntersville by General Milroy with seven hundred and thirty-eight cavalry. On arriving at the bridge he found a small picket post where the Confederates made a brief stand and then withdrew to a point farther on where quite a skirmish followed. The Confederates for want of adequate force fell back and Webster advanced on to Huntersville where he found six buildings filled with provisions which he set on fire and then took up his backward march by the light of the conflagration. This occurred on January 2, 1862.

While at Beverly the soldiers filled their haversacks from the captured goods with meat, sugar and coffee and other unusual articles for a soldier on the march. The writer failed to get a supply of bread and crackers and subsisting on meat and sugar such articles, realized the truth of the saying that after all, "bread is the staff of life."

Thus far the entire route over which we had afforded an example of a war swept region. Union people whom we met seemed free from the hostile attitude so many felt along the northern border of Virginia. The journey pursued until we reached our old encampment led by Warm Springs and Deerfield. The night spent near the Warm Springs was cold; in fact there was a great deal of cold and gloomy weather. But I noted in my diary the fact that of Sunday night the 15th that the suffering among the soldiers was intense while with the prisoner it was almost beyond description. Thus in twelve days was accomplished an adventure rarely surpassed in heroic endurance among the achievements of American history.

I am opposed to war and believe that the war between the states should never have been. And it is certainly to Mr. Wilson's credit that he kept our country from war until no other alternative remained. President Wilson when all means had been exhausted though braked by every member of his cabinet and a reunited people, placed the responsibility on congress. President Lincoln was backed by two members of his cabinet while the other five were opposed to his action. Instead of placing the responsibility on the law making body he assumed the responsibility and called for troops without affording opportunity for some method of reconciliation. The prayer of every American citizen should be that some means for peace may still avail.

CARD OF THANKS
 We desire publicly to express our appreciation and thanks to four good neighbors for the many kindnesses, sympathy and help during the recent illness and death of our dear husband and father. No man ever had more loyal neighbors and he was often heard to speak of their loyalty and good attention to him while sick. We can not hope to repay these people for this loyal and selfless help. We pray Almighty God that his richest blessings may attend each one of them not only in life but in sickness and death.

UNSHAKEN TESTIMONY
 Time is the test of truth. And Doan's Kidney Pills have stood the test in Marlinton. No Marlinton resident who suffers backache, or any annoying kidney ills can remain unconvinced by this true-to-life testimony. Mrs. Loyd Osborne, Upper Camden Ave., Marlinton, gave the following statement in May, 1913: "My back hurt me nearly all the time and there were dull, dragging pains right over my kidneys. My kidneys were inactive. I had headaches and was subject to dizzy and nervous spells. I heard about Doan's Kidney Pills and used some. They gave me complete relief in every way and my kidneys gave me no more trouble. The backache left and I no longer had any headaches or dizzy and nervous spells."

Later Testimony.
 On February 5, 1917, Mrs. Osborne said: "Once in awhile, I still use Doan's Kidney Pills. I never fail to get the same good results."
